Now he travels gayly off, secure in the possession of an almost empty house, for which even the negligent watchman who patrols the block, when he does not feel sleepy, is superfluous. The summer cottage, easy to enter, full of valuables and commonly unguarded, falls a much easier prey to the marauder, and once it is robbed the average rural policeman is safe not to trouble the robber by detecting him.— Albert Trumble in New York News.

An Economical President President Grevy is allowed 300,000 francs yearly for traveling expenses, but as his travel only amounts to one summer trip to his villa at Montrousa Vaudry, his annual savings from that source, according to The Gazette de France, amounts to 200,905 francs, or, for the total lenght of his term, to 5,388,297 francs. The Gazette satirically reminds its readers that Grevy has on the whole remained true to his early convictions, which led him, when still an obscure country lawyer, to favor the abelition of the pre-sidency on the score of public economy.—
